The following summarizes critical elements relative to the assessment criteria. (1) The primary load path for structural tests typically includes seat components, such as seat legs, lateral beams (cross tubes), spreaders, cushion supports and cushions, seatbelts and their attachments, attachments between structural members, seat track fittings, and energy absorbers. (Observe that energy-absorbers are normally integrated into the other seat components.) The strength and deformation responses of these members are evaluated during structural tests. (2) The primary load path for lumbar load tests typically includes bottom cushions, bottom cushion supports, and lateral beams (cross tubes). Also part of this load path are seat legs, spreaders, attachments between structural members, seat track fittings, and energy absorbers. (3) The primary load path for row-to-row HIC tests typically includes components in the seat assemblies, such as those installed on the seat back (for example,...
